(57) ABSTRACT

Techniques for annotating an electronic document in an electronic document application are described. A request to add an annotation to an electronic document application is received. An annotation template for the requested annotation is retrieved. The annotation template is external to the electronic document application and the electronic document and includes fixed content, associated instructions defining variable content, and layout information for the fixed and variable content. The associated instructions are executed to define the variable content for an instance of the requested annotation.
The instance of the annotation is applied to the electronic document. The annotation instance has an appearance defined by the variable content, the fixed content and the layout information.

Natural language policy documents are frequently used as starting point for requirements capture, leading to computer systems that manage process management within organisations. Rather than modelling explicit workflow graphs of business processes, this paper proposes presentation of annotated versions of the natural language policy documents as a user interface indicating both the status of task progress and appropriate progress routes. A deontic adaptation of the Event Calculus is presented to monitor the normative state of compliance. A non-tree-based document annotation scheme is used to allow a natural language text to be annotated with a logic program developed to represent its intentions. The approach is demonstrated by the encoding and presentation through a web application of a section of the United States Food and Drugs Administration regulations.
